motivational hedonism often called psychological hedonism claims that everything we do is done in pursuit of pleasure in the widest sense and to avoid pain and displeasure again in the widest sense although perennially attractive many philosophers and experimental psychologists have claimed to refute it human motives shows how decision science and the recent science of affect can be used to construct a form of motivational hedonism that evades all previous critiques on this view we take decisions by anticipating and responding affectively to the alternatives with the pleasure displeasure component of affect constituting the common currency of decision making but we do not have to believe that the alternatives will bring us pleasure or displeasure in the future rather those feelings get bound into and become parts of the future directed representation of the options rendering the latter attractive or repulsive much then depends on what pleasure and displeasure really are if they are intrinsically good or bad properties of experience for example then motivational hedonism results carruthers argues in contrast that the best account is a representational one pleasure represents its object nonconceptually in a perception like manner as good and displeasure represents it nonconceptually as bad the result is pluralism about human motivation making room for both genuine altruism and intrinsic motives of duty clearly written and deeply scientifically informed human motives has implications for many areas of philosophy and cognitive science and will be of interest to anyone wanting to
